Although the political situation of Latin America can be caused by external factors, such as pressure from the United States, the internal factors play the fundamental reason for instability. Sluggish economy, poverty, and the gap between rich and poor are major domestic problems, which can affect the political situation of the region.

From a long-term perspective, the democracy in Latin America will be further consolidated and developed, and the political situation should become more stable. But in the near future, because economic development will not be fast, the political situation of Latin American countries does not look rosy in the short term.
